Multi-chip modules (MCM) and/or multi-chip packages (MCP), also known as multi-chip modules (MCM) and/or multi-chip packages (MCP) may provide a solution for the lack of a desired functionality in a single chip and also allow for the integration of functions into a single chip, thus providing a higher performance device. However, due to the complex internal structures of multi-chip packages, their manufacture may involve complicated processes, high manufacturing costs and may suffer from poor reliability.Pituitary function in aging women. In postmenopausal women, the hypothalamic-pituitary-ovarian axis undergoes an age-related decline in the production of ovarian steroids. It has become increasingly clear that the functional status of the hypothalamic-pituitary axis in humans is far more complex and less simple than was previously described. It is now recognized that not only pituitary gonadotropes, but also gonadotropin-releasing hormone (GnRH) cells, are markedly affected with aging, and that the effect of aging on hypothalamic gonadotropin-releasing hormone (GnRH) cells results from both a decrease in the total number of cells and a significant reduction in the secretory capacity of the individual cells. Despite the striking changes in the "pituitary axis" with aging, one pituitary gonadotropin (FSH) secretory activity remains unaffected, namely the episodic, pulsatile release of hormone, which appears to be regulated in a manner similar to that of men. The mechanisms underlying the reduction in GnRH cell function remain to be elucidated, but the regulation of GnRH cell secretion by ovarian steroids is well-known. Moreover, the kisspeptin system is involved in the pulsatile secretion of GnRH. A combination of
