We examined whether patients with eating disorders have an increased risk for an unplanned pregnancy during their acute eating disorder. In addition, we studied the impact of treatment on pregnancy course. In this prospective study of 75 eating-disordered patients, we evaluated pregnancy outcome and the length of the abstinence period. We investigated the prevalence of patients in different stages of treatment. Unplanned pregnancy prevalence was 6% in patients on acute treatment and 24% in patients in recovery or who had completed the treatment program, compared with 5% in control subjects. The impact of stage of treatment on pregnancy incidence was not significant. A longer abstinence period was associated with a higher prevalence of unplanned pregnancy (P
