Anaerobic co-digestion of mixed solid waste with different organic loading rates in a lab-scale anaerobic baffled reactor (ABR) was studied to investigate the influence of organic loading rate on system stability. The substrate diversity ratio of wastewater and hog manure was selected as 6:4. The reactor performance indicated that increasing organic loading rates resulted in better stability of the system and led to higher biogas production (Y(B/S) increased from 0.95 to 1.05). Based on the analysis of the system stability index (SSI), four stable phases (four months) were found with the organic loading rates of 0.5, 0.8, 1.2, 1.6 g x(L x d)(-1) (X-axis: organic loading rate, Y-axis: SSI). The concentration of VFA, TN, NH(4)(+)-N increased with the increase of organic loading rates. When the organic loading rates were 1.2-1.6 g x(L x d)(-1), the biogas production was the highest (806.5-720.7 mL x d(-1)). The acetate concentration was the highest at 0.8-1.2 g x(L x d)(-1) (275.6-942.7 mg x L(-1)), but butyric acid was the highest at 1.6 g x(L x d)(-1) (38.0-112.6 mg x L(-1)). The inoculation of swine manure increased the OLR from 0.5 to 1.6 g x(L x d)(-1) (Y-axis: OLR: increasing organic loading rates, X-axis: duration of experiments), but no significant difference in biogas production was found between inoculation of swine manure and sewage inoculum at the different organic loading rates.Q: Rows
