“We don’t want FIFA to look like the next generation of football is just more shooting and less skill,” commented Andrew Waddell, co-head of development. “We want FIFA to feel like the next generation of football is more clever, more different, more groundbreaking.” The amount of time and effort that goes into the physicality, or “feel,” of a game is a massive part of the player experience. “The movement of all 22 players in a football match is really complex, and in the past it has been a massive challenge to accurately reproduce that on a game engine,” Waddell explained. “With HyperMotion, we have been able to capture so much movement and create an experience that is closer to playing real football. It’s going to make the game more realistic and exciting for players of all skill levels.” The innovations in HyperMotion Technology brings a number of enhancements to the engine, including new player movement. “The way people naturally move is incredibly complex and variable – from one individual to another it can look completely different,” Waddell said. “We have captured a tremendous amount of natural movement. It makes the gameplay feel authentic and brings a fresh perspective to the player experience.” Analytics are also taking center stage in this year’s iteration of FIFA. On the player analytics side, the engine automatically records in game situations when a player wins, loses, leads or trails in possession. Additionally, there is the ability to time passes, speed, accuracy, sprints and players shooting or passing as well. The AI side of the engine gathers this data as well. Statistics on each player in the game are automatically collected over the course of a season, including goals, assists, shots, crosses, shots blocked, and key passes. The data that is collected on players is used to help influence which players receive which rewards. The engine can also automatically classify players based on the amount of experience they have with the game. The FUT team has also put a lot of focus on making FIFA better overall. The new adaption to the game will include a new “crease transition” animation for corner kicks, new goalkeepers, defenders and players. There will also be more on-ball actions, like dribbles, turns, and tricky runs. The team has
