

Modern player movement has advanced significantly over the past two decades, particularly with regard to ball progression. Throughout the 19th century, football was played on a large pitched area with a goal at each end. The game was then played with a single ball that would be kicked around by the players, who would perform dribbling and passing techniques to create movement. Teams would have up to 10 players, who would now spend their time playing around the ball, using their skill and ability to create opportunities. Players would run with the ball to give themselves the greatest chance of scoring or winning the ball back. This often involved a variety of possession techniques: driving, feinting, jinking, luring, and dribbling. Players used these skills to gain an advantage over their opposition – either by accident or by purpose. There was no dribbling, no dribbling, and no touchline to defend. The game was a swarming, free-flowing adventure, filled with an endless array of opponents. Ball-in-hand dribbling was the only defensive tactic, and it was simply not possible. The game was simple, yet this simplicity, at one time, would not have been possible without the incredible advances made by the world’s leading football scientists. Over the past few years the science of the football pitch has advanced to a level we could only dream about at the turn of the century. Pre-match video analysis The future of football lies in new, precise science that allows footballers to be coached in a whole new way. Pre-match video analysis (VMAP) is already an integral part of team building at most top football clubs. In 2017, almost a third (30%) of the Premier League is already using VMAP. League regulations require that clubs, on their final day of the season, submit a daily review of their squad and players to FIFA, and demonstrate to FIFA’s Head of Footballing Sciences that they are using the best available statistics and analytics to aid in the coaching of players. If a club finishes the season in the top four, they can apply for a licence to provide VMAP to all teams in the Premier League. This new investment will ensure that the quality of coaching even more closely matches that of the professional players themselves. The use of data analytics to help better understand football has been a hot topic over the past decade. Between 2005 and 2018, the number of scientific studies that have been carried out in the world of
