New features for the ball physics improve ball control, define the physics of the ball, reproduce the aerodynamic behavior of the ball when it moves through the air and add new routines such as “impossible gravity,” where the ball remains stuck to the player with unreal bounce and precision without clipping against objects. Improvements to the player animation system provide the most accurate player animations in the entire series, while an advanced footwear setup and new over-the-top tricks significantly increase the variety of player moves to cover every play style. This screen was captured from an unboxing in the video above. It shows the ball physics working in a match mode. Below, the ball is spinning with the player skating through the wall and past opponents to score a goal. Here, the controls are slick and responsive, as the player rolls around a ball in midair, passes it off to one of his teammates and gets tapped in the face during the game. But there's just one problem: the ball is stuck to his head. New features for the ball physics (and graphics, such as free-kicks) in the video above include: Realistic player animations — Players now react more realistically to the physics of the ball and the collisions it receives. -- Players now react more realistically to the physics of the ball and the collisions it receives. Trapping and flipping — Trapping is caused when the ball lands against a player and collides with a fixed mesh. The ball will be trapped, moving only on the player's sides. -- Trapping is caused when the ball lands against a player and collides with a fixed mesh. You're going to have to be creative. Marketing? It's the same word as football. Product? That's a misnomer. So when EA Sports released FIFA for the first time in Germany in October 2009, I thought it was the perfect opportunity to try to think of a great name to keep the hype up. That's when I came up with "Fifty-Four". EA Sports was tight-lipped. F-U-N. That's FIFA as in football. It's also the name of the original FIFA game. We know what the brand is: it's football. And the name "FIFTY-FOUR" is the exact same number as the age of a barrel of potatoes, the number of football-playing countries on this planet or the number of football players worldwide. It's a perfect name. Needless to say, EA Sports ended up with FIFA and I've been running it ever since. The new season of innovation EA SPORTS FIFA 22 marks a new season of innovation for the award-winning franchise. Together, we've created more realistic players, more accurate ball physics and more authentic gameplay. The result is FIFA that feels incredibly familiar, yet completely unique. Gameplay The all-new Player Impact Engine delivers incredible quality of character, helping to bring more meaningful feelings to the intensity and unpredictability of an out-of-pitch challenge. With the Player Impact Engine, we are able to better capture all the subtleties of player behaviour as they compete to win the ball and influence the game.
