Journey. In vivo motion assessment of cartilage grafts in the equine superficial digital flexor tendon repair site using ultrasound. To use ultrasound to assess in vivo the immediate response of cartilage grafts to repair a peripheral digital tendon in the equine superficial digital flexor tendon repair site.

Randomised clinical trial.

Twelve sound, 4-year-old Thoroughbred horses. Horses were randomised to 1 of 3 treatment groups: group 1 (n = 6): graft (2 x 10 mm of articular cartilage and one (5 mm) of cranial cruciate ligament) transplantation to the repair site; group 2 (n = 6): graft transplantation to the repair site; or group 3 (n = 6): no grafts implanted. The repair site was assessed by ultrasound at weekly intervals for 12 weeks. The signal-to-noise ratio (SNR) of the repaired site was computed and the percent defect coverage estimated by ultrasound, using the signal-tracking technique, and the results were compared with subjective visual inspection of the repair site. Ultrasound proved to be an accurate technique to assess the defect coverage of the repair site.

SNR of the repair site was significantly greater ($P = 0.04$) in group 2 (mean \pm standard deviation (SD), 22.5 \pm 5.0%) than in group 3 (11.2 +/- 3.0%). Mean +/- SD% defect coverage of the repair site estimated by ultrasound was significantly greater ($P = 0.03$) in group 2 (97.8 +/- 2.5%) than in group 1 (86.3 +/- 3.5%) and group 3 (86.5 +/- 5.1%). SNR and defect coverage estimated by ultrasound correlated with the visual inspection of the repair site ($P = 0.007$ and $P = 0.02$, respectively). Ultrasound is useful in assessing the in vivo response of cartilage grafts to heal a peripheral digital tendon repair site in the equine superficial digital flexor tendon. In particular, the signal-tracking technique is particularly useful in the evaluation of grafts.
