How are life, politics, violence, and drugs mated at remote French inns? By Bruce Masters Published: December 2004 This article originally appeared in The Paris Review, Fall 2008. The horseback deliveries of Hell's Backbone by Jim Harrison are always dangerous. The backbones are tough as leather, and the Parisian hotels that serve as delivery centers have safe rooms that they use if riders get hurt. But some deliveries are much more dangerous than others. Delivered by helicopter is, for example, a greater hazard than delivered by horse. A hard drink known as vermouth hits me pretty quickly on one delivery, and the minute the back is over my shoulder, I know that sometime during the next three days, I will get drunk. A hard drink, after all, can, in one short glass, knock over its owner. So the rider deals with it, recklessly calculating the cost against the benefit. As many of the riders are on the rise, they in no way dare to deny the horse the drink. As it happens, I'm riding a new-to-me horse whose name is Railsauce. He is fourteen hands, broad backed, and he is happy, he curves into plodding, tireless, ride after ride. His legs are well spaced, as one would wish, with broad hooves and feet. When we arrive at the inn I am anxious about going into the night alone with him. For a moment, before I can brave it and start pumping water out of his mouth into the bottle, he sits down for a round. Sometimes, anyway, when there are no riders, a set of stable boys will look at the horse and decide, Hey, why shouldn't it get some water? They give the animal a quart of water. So on this day, I hurry down the alleyway between the stable and the house, make sure I have the bottle in one hand, and start pumping into Rail's mouth. For reasons unknown to me, he spits the water out and tries to bite me. Just a maddening thing, this. The horse is not far from Blue Ruin, an earlier delivery to bring us the vermouth, and he raises one white, hot-eyed, half-eared head and nips my thumb before I can squirt him dry. The stable guys, on the other hand, are all laughing. "Stupid horse,"

Elite School Roof Club is a visual novel, with RPG elements, that's super-hard. You are in control of the life of Kenn, who as you play, must try to raise enough money for a building project at his school. It might be the only thing that can keep the school running, and the students in it alive. However, every school building project has its own set of problems, and there are no guarantees of success. All in all, you need to raise the school roof - and all of its money - while in the process of killing a ton of demons and scanning for inter-dimensional anomalies. You use an arrow pad in order to interact with the world, and there are additional items to equip and abilities to learn along the way. Hey! As of this moment, this game features an entire quest line, and even a full ending! Its is super hard, you might want to save often, since once you start playing through this game, you might find yourself invested in its hours. And yeah, it'll probably take you, like, two weeks or something to finish it. So... no pressure. Features: - Over 100 hours of gameplay! - 20 different endings! - Alt History to unlock and see - A ton of unique and crazy characters! - Lots of choices - Dozens of goals to accomplish - Explore the world with an adorably in-your-face map view! - Play multiple endings in the same game! - Lots of debug features! - It's a visual novel with RPG elements! - Funny and/or humorous choices to make! - Find cool characters to meet along the way! - Lots of stickers! - New events and characters to come! - All of the jokes are 100% intentional! - Part of the 'Ratings' system! - A heart of gold inside every demon's heart! - Lots of weirdos to meet! - An incredibly difficult game to play! - Support characters to unlock! - The 'good' school bus is invincible, and has an obnoxious sound effect! - But the 'evil' school bus is actually real! - Now that you've made it this far, there's no turning back! Don't go too far!! - A prompt where you may press a button to talk to a random character! - Lots of crazy side-quests to do! -
