Description of the Prior Art There has been developed and manufactured an optical disk having a digital information record area formed by controlling the exposure intensity of a laser beam by means of a light intensity modulation system. The recording capacity of the optical disk is significantly larger than that of a general magnetic disk. For example, 1.4 Mbits can be recorded on one surface of the disk. Under the condition where the signals are recorded with a large difference in signal level between the land and groove, the land and groove are recorded by different tracks. In the video recording mode, the laser beam is modulated by the digital video signals which are supplied from the outside to record the digital signals on the information record area. The space between the land and groove is used for the data and servo-signals. The land area is used for data and the groove area is used for servo-signals. It has not been sufficiently studied to use such a video disk efficiently. Moreover, under the present situation, the disk cannot be played by general digital audio disk players. A disk-shaped recording medium of the kind removably attached to a recording and/or reproducing apparatus for recording or reproducing information thereon has been proposed. A disk-shaped recording medium of this kind comprises a disk-shaped recording layer composed of a recording material, an external substrate made of a plastic sheet having formed thereon an identification hole through which the recording area of the recording layer is visible, a transparent substrate made of a transparent material and an identification hole formed in the transparent substrate through which the recording area of the recording layer is visible, a plurality of recesses formed on the lower side of the transparent substrate and a contact hole formed on the lower side of the transparent substrate through which an optical head or the like is allowed to enter into the information recording area of the recording layer. The contact hole is formed by cutting the lower surface of the transparent substrate at a predetermined position. The following conventional reproducing method has been employed in such a disk-shaped recording medium. That is, when the disk-shaped recording medium is attached to the apparatus, a light beam is irradiated to the identification hole, and the reflected light is detected by a
