The condition can occur in isolation, or with other congenital malformations of the pituitary gland, such as optic nerve hypoplasia, hypogonadism or hypothyroidism. The condition is considered to be the result of a failure of normal pituitary gland development during embryonic development. The body produces more growth hormones and gonadotropins than it needs, and the pituitary gland produces only limited amounts of growth hormones and gonadotropins. The pituitary gland is, on average, 10% of the size of a normal gland. In infants there may be only traces of the anterior pituitary gland. In older children the absence of anterior pituitary hormone may be more obvious, but the posterior lobe may be visible. The hypoplastic pituitary gland may be displaced anteriorly or may be very small, up to 8 mm in diameter. If present, the anterior lobe tends to be disorganized with broad interconnecting septae rather than organized into the characteristic three lobes. If the hormone levels in the blood are significantly low there may be a reduction in the appearance of the
