What's New In?

The present invention relates to a parking gate to be installed on a back gate. In order to park a vehicle behind a back gate, the gate is usually placed at a place where there are few pedestrians so that pedestrians can readily board a vehicle parked behind the gate. If the gate is placed at a place where pedestrians are likely to be present, then the driveability of the vehicle parked behind the gate is affected. Therefore, it is preferable to install a gate at a place where the likelihood of pedestrians boarding the vehicle parked behind the gate is low. However, if there are no pedestrians around, then the vehicle may remain in the same place for a long time, and this is inconvenient for a user. Further, in cases where the vehicle parked behind the gate is a vehicle driven by a child or young person, there is a possibility that the person may leave the vehicle while the child is away from the vehicle. In such a case, it is necessary to install a vehicle key control gate at the place where the vehicle is parked. As an example of such a vehicle key control gate, there has been disclosed a vehicle key control apparatus (see patent reference 1) comprising an impact sensor disposed between a vehicle and a gate, and a motor that opens the gate when the impact sensor detects an impact.
