Q: Wrong output for simple graphing program C++ I'm writing a graphing program in C++. I'm using the library called "Simple Grapher" and "Graphviz" to draw some graphs. I decided to use this project to teach myself how to write C++. I used some of the information from this tutorial, and placed it in my program. It works fine but it displays a different output to what I expected. The program starts by asking the user to input two numbers. The program then finds their average and divides it by 100 to make it easy to read. It also finds the greatest and the least values. Then it asks the user to input the number of times the greatest value occurs. Then it asks the user to input the number of times the least value occurs. Then it asks the user to input the numbers that are between the greatest and the least value. Then it asks the user to input the numbers that are between the average and the greatest value. Then it asks the user to input the numbers that are between the average and the least value. Then it asks the user to input the numbers that are between the greatest and the least value. Then it asks the user to input the numbers that are between the least and the average. Then it asks the user to input the numbers that are between the lowest value and the greatest value. Then it prints the input numbers and the output numbers.
