That is, you can't successfully use it in a multi-user setting, i.e. when you are running multiple non-ID-enabled programs like Word and Access. If you are attempting to embed the ID card reader directly into another product (i.e. Word) - and you don't have the history of using the ID card to unlock programs - you will run into the same problem. The only way to truly unlock all of your programs is to use some form of full-on dongle-based solution, like the HID campus solution, but that assumes you are going to buy the HID campus solution all at once. For anyone that may not know what a HID campus solution is, it works like this: a HID campus provides a keypad with a universal/one-size-fits-all ID card reader. You then plug the card reader into a computer using some kind of dongle and leave the computer itself unattended. In other words, it looks like this: Any time a user is on the network, and the card reader detects the ID card, that user is automatically granted access to all of the authorized applications the card was used to unlock. If you also use the HID campus solution, you don't have to keep track of any serial numbers, since all of your serial numbers are served up to you through the HID campus. There are also license-based solutions, too, like zona.com that allow you to select a fee (and change it at any time) for a fixed number of users. That way if you have multiple users, you can make sure everyone pays their share of the cost without having to worry about doing so yourself. The other thing to consider is that most ID card software vendors are not going to let you self-install the application, since it is essentially a rootkit that is designed to access your computer without you realizing it. When you get a license from a vendor, you will either be sent a CD/DVD (that you can install on multiple computers) or an installation/activation disc (which you can install on a single computer and activate from there). I don't have an answer for you for how to get your office onto HID, but since you are just using it as a way to access a very specific subset of ID-enabled applications, you could run into more problems than you might expect if you try. You can run HID campus from your laptop, and then
