Adjusting settings The tools you use to adjust settings in your image file come in three varieties: Layer, Paths, and Layers. When you're editing an image, you use the Layer settings. If you create a selection with the Paths tool, you use the Paths settings. The Layers settings control the settings on the top layer. In this way, any edits you make to an image apply only to the top layer. Also, any edits applied to an image through a Layers mask are considered `_destructive_` edits — meaning they overwrite the original file — and if you decide to undo those changes and try again, the image returns to its original state. You can use any of the tools from the preceding list to adjust an image's settings. The following sections walk you through the most common tools and explain what they do.

This week, the average pump price in Alberta went back up to just under $1.30, the highest it has been since last summer. It is a travesty that after the oil price drop that coincided with our federal election in October, some Albertans went out to the pumps and immediately found the price of a gallon of gas to be below $1.50. The Canadian government did the same thing — it cut its own revenue for the past month while waiting for a better time to re-introduce its expected budget on Jan. 27. Unfortunately, the other side of the coin is that many drivers, who had brought their vehicles to the dealer to be serviced, and waited patiently for hours only to find their bill increased, now feel cheated by the current situation. Now that summer is finally here, what are your summers plans? Are you going to be spending your days out at the beach, doing some water sports or just relaxing at your local lake?
