I have a few programs that have a problem opening files when logged into an account using a domain user account. Having the Admin account log off and log on to another account that is not the Admin account, will allow the program to open the files.

I'm running into limits on how many mysqld will allow to happen within a short period of time. For example: XClient can open a total of 30 connections to the database. Each connection (Client) can perform a total of 30 transactions. Each transaction (Client) can take a maximum of 1 second to complete. Running EXPLAIN for a query will show that 30 distinct connections have been initiated, but running mysqlnd_trans_status shows 30 transactions have been queued, and only one is being executed. When I first started using transactions, I was told that mysql was slowing down so much as the number of connections increased that I should consider reducing the size of MySQL transactions. Is that true? Can I configure MySQL to handle my transactions as efficiently as possible? A: You might want to scale your transactions per second by setting up more connections, not transactions per connection. If you have multi-statement transactions, some will be executed per connection (at least in some databases), some per statement and others per transaction. A: Connections, I think, are actually split per transaction, not per statement. Explanation here
