a fourth problem is making sure that the tps has the buying power and the expertise to compete successfully. there are many choices that a tps can make about the type of service, its features, and its price. the choice of service should be determined by the features that are most needed, the amount of competition, and what the buyers are willing to pay for. even though there are many choices, they often are limited in number. therefore, the tps should be able to serve as a specialized consumer of the best available offerings (e.g., an information market; see section chapter 12 of this report). another option is to simply subsidize smaller tpss with the financial benefits of being part of a large corporate r&d unit. this is especially true given that most of the smaller tpss are very small, nonviable ventures. in addition, there is an option to regulate the business activity of the tps, such as making the commission for preventing illegal sales by licensees or by making licenses cost-prohibitive to the companies being licensed, which may be a substitute for requiring software prices to come down. a fifth problem is that a tps that is not part of a secure content management software/system is unlikely to be allowed to prevent the sale of product that results from the exportation and/or importation of copyrighted material by users. the reasons are twofold. first, content management software/systems seek to enable the development of a legal market for content in other countries and second, they seek to create a worldwide content market that is seen to be fair. as such, it is contrary to the objectives of the tps to prevent the sale of content that results from the exportation and/or importation of copyrighted material by users. it is also unlikely that tpss will be given the ability to stop content that would violate local laws.

Vital signs: We find ourselves in a brave new digital world. We are swimming in "big data." Already, the socio-economic, political, military, and medical impacts of harnessing the insights generated by the expedited growth of electronic information storage and transmission through the Internet and other technological advances are obvious. Our lives are firmly embedded in this information age and are profoundly impacted by it. Privacy is no longer a luxury item. The client may also require the server to set up a one-time-only database entry. This requires that the server provide its long-term identification name. But the database entry does not require that the server send any private key information to the client.

This allows the client to run a database lookup (using the server's long-term identification name) and if the client has access to the entry corresponding to that name, it will be able to use it. Finally, the client and server calculate a shared key using the DES method, and use it to encrypt the user's username and passphrase. The step of calculating the shared key is a two-way operation, meaning that each side must encrypt the shared key with its own private key. Now, suppose that the client requires the user to provide a username and a new password. The client first checks the one-time-only database lookup. If this request has access to the database entry corresponding to the server's long-term identification name, it will receive the user's new password in that database entry (if it exists). If no entry corresponds to the server's long-term identification name, the client assumes the user has never heard of the service and refuses to work. Finally, the client uses the previously established shared key to encrypt the new password. This final step is very simple: 5ec8ef588b
