the free demo is a great way to sample the product, but when it's time to buy, the trial is over. professional grade audio is not cheap. in fact, you'll have to upgrade soon or forever hold your peace. if i wanted to create a killer demo track, i would simply grab a cheap track off of a demo folder and throw on some reverb. then, i'd have something to post on my own site. if im trying to sell a professional grade product, i need to simulate a professional job. thats what software demos are for. you can't really go wrong with audacity. its a great freeware app for those who just need something to record themselves playing. its also a very capable multitrack recorder. and once you have a few of these in your arsenal, it's also an excellent way to synchronize audio files, which is important, because if you're importing music or video into your presentation, you want the beats and voice and image to play at the same time. youll need to make sure that you've never edited your music, which is pretty easy these days with all the free apps out there. while its not a 3d audio editor, it does the job. if you're looking for a plug-in that's a no-brainer, audacity or any other audio editor that has a line in will do just fine. so whats the verdict on this one? is it good enough to buy? its up to you. because it's a free/demo app, it may take you a bit to get comfortable using it. when you first open it, it's kind of overwhelming for the uninitiated. but once you get into it, its easy to see why more and more people are using it. the program is extremely powerful, but it's the bread and butter of those who use it.
