While several lines of evidence suggest that serotonin is involved in the regulation of the basal ganglia, its role in Parkinson's disease is less clear. In mice lacking the serotonin transporter (5-HTT) or treated with its selective inhibitor, the sub-acute administration of 1-methyl-4-phenyl-1,2,3,6-tetrahydropyridine (MPTP) was shown to lead to similar deficits in the forelimb movements as in the nigrostriatal dopaminergic denervation produced by 6-hydroxydopamine. Our data suggests that 5-HTT-deficient mice are more sensitive to MPTP. In contrast, a recent study described a motor deficit only in the 5-HTT KO mice 6 days after MPTP injection, thus highlighting the need for further studies using different pharmacological and genetic approaches.April 20, 2012 I remember sitting around a conference table in 1995 with a bunch of guys who had recently started a company I'd never heard of called WWT (the actual acronym was "Worthwhile Work Time"). They started by asking me, "What is your ideal business?" As you can imagine, I was a little confused. So I said, "Well, I suppose the ideal business is one that maximizes its impact on society by making people happy." And I was wondering why they didn't just ask if they had said anything meaningful at all. That was probably the first time I learned the idea of "maximizing impact on society" might be a bit too vague.
