One of the big issues with an iPad is that we are limited to using the stylus as a mouse – or at least, that’s what I feel when using it on iOS. We have to use the onscreen keyboard to enter text, but when it comes to annotating images, graphing lines or circles or adding text, we have no obvious option for such things other than to do so with a mouse. For me, that’s a huge shortcoming. As a whole, Photoshop is a great way to share and edit images quickly. But the Elements line isn’t meant to be weak in EPS formats. It’s intended for home users who want to demo, purchase, print, or resize a picture from the start. So, regardless of the length of time I have used it, I expect that Lightroom will be my primary, direct workflow tool moving forward. When you aren’t in editing mode, you can press the new single key, which shrinks the window, so that you have more room to work in. I like that, but it would be a lot more useful if the entire workspace could be shrunk. That’s how I feel about the main interface. Every action or function has a small, tiny button. I am not one to waste my time trying to figure things out. I want to be able to perform tasks with a few clicks of my mouse, not a lot of fumbling. The old process was better because I could view three images at a time. With the new layout, I have to click on a photo while viewing the other two to make any changes. This means I’m much more likely to miss a tweak in one frame while concentrating on another.
