Getting started with Adobe Photoshop Lightroom is easy. With a 16GB SD card in a microSD slot, the card, Lightroom's image library, and metadata are all loaded onto the card in a matter of seconds. Get your copy from the Adobe Web site , but before you do, you'll want to create (or find) a free Adobe Account, which is a way of registering your Photoshop file and getting access to collaboration tokens (and a bonus of free apps). There's a discussion board here on Eddie Chan's website if you have troubles. Adobe continues to regularly update its subscription model, and with the big news that the Mac version of Photoshop will be free to both new and existing subscribers, the company will likely be watching its numbers closely. If you've ever put off updating to the subscription model because of price, now's as good a time as any to revisit Adobe's offer. I wish I could read between the lines of your article as to your position on the software, but I can't. I understand there is a review here but I have no idea what he is talking about there. I would like to come to the defense of Adobe (and by association Lightroom) a number of times. I mostly use Photoshop CS6 and Lightroom 5 because they are the best options for my workflow. Fortunately there is a lot of documentation available to help me figure out how to use Photoshop the way I like do. I never use any of the new features that are only included in 10.0.1 and below. I do use some of the newest features in CS6 and my workflow is certainly more automated than it was with PS 5. I didn't like that Lightroom 5 removed the Artistic Controls panel, but I understand that it was replaced with a dialogue that works just as well. This entire review is all word salad to me and just creates more confusion. I'm sure the author used stock images, as they always look better than any of my own (and I'm a fan of stock photography anyway). I use the free Lightroom mobile app often, so it can be as responsive as I can have without having to load the desktop program. There is never a problem with performance for me when I am editing photos. PS is extremely fast for me when working with RAW files. When I work with JPEGs, I often use the PSD format and I don't think that is a huge issue. My biggest complaint with Photoshop is the lack of development roadmap. I just always liked it better when they had plans and were honest about them. I'm not upset that there is no update to fix the huge number of bugs in LR 5.2. I just expected them to be fixed by now, but they weren't.
