I am confident that nothing is wrong with Lightroom and that Adobe will continue to release updates that make it even better. I hope that it will come to light, in 2007, that Lightroom is a very good tool and I would recommend it to anyone. Besides, competition is a good thing. It will keep Adobe working harder and deliver us an even smoother product. The last app in this "Warwick Photos for Windows" series (which examines how best to crop and manage your digitized images in a Windows environment) is. This app is especially useful for Mac and Linux users, who can't use the command line utilities that I rely on. It's a fairly easy-to-use JPEG manipulation app. Its biggest drawback is price: Exposure costs $25. For that you get 8-bit JPEG and powerful features. Better yet, the latest 3.6 version is free. Exposure does have its issues, but it's one of the more straightforward apps in this category. Photoshop on the iPad is sharp and responsive, making Lightroom and other desktop apps seem like a lazy afterthought. Lightroom and Photoshop CC do have limitations, but they're not indefensible, particularly when an iPad is involved. After upgrading to the latest iOS 9, it became clear the app is seriously lacking in the user interface department. From a workflow perspective it's very clear why we've never seen a Photoshop update for the iPad and iOS. The clumsy UI in iOS 9 are dragging down productivity as a whole. For the first time in years, Adobe has officially confirmed that the iPad will not be getting its own version of Photoshop. This is already old news anyway, but Adobe now has to get creative about explaining the lack of an iOS version. Under the circumstances, an iPad app still makes sense.

Los Angeles is home to the world's most creative and innovative employers in the fields of technology, media, gaming, fashion, publishing, arts, entertainment, business, and more. The city is among top cities in the U.S. in number of venture capital investments and is home to greater than a quarter million technology startups. According to a recent U.S. Office & Apartment Vacancy and Construction Projections report by the Hartman-Rovell Group, major technology companies including TheGoogle, Apple, Intel, Facebook, and Research In Motion are collaborating on new campuses and open innovation labs to create a more creative and innovative culture. Deloitte currently ranks Los Angeles as one of the top regional markets in the U.S. for large tech clusters, ranking second among tech-producing regions in the U.S. However, while many hard-working and successful people choose to reside in or near the downtown Los Angeles region, there are still many out-of-work professionals - including daytime and nighttime shift workers - who are in need of affordable apartments. With some of the lowest vacancy rates in the Los Angeles area, there is a large number of apartments that are rental-ready or vacancy-ready. As of December 2014, there were 1,256,721 apartments in the Los Angeles area with one or more bedrooms, an increase of about 8.6% from the same time last year. Of those rentals, 90.4% were owner-occupied compared to 69% last year, while 1.2% were rented.
